More than 540,000 Volunteers Worldwide have Participated in Global Community Day Activities Since Launch in 2006

Toronto – As more than 70,000 Citi volunteers in 479 cities spanning 93 countries around the world engage in service activities to benefit their local communities, Citi today will mark its ninth annual Global Community Day. Working side-by-side, Citi colleagues, alumni, family and friends will demonstrate the company's commitment to supporting and improving communities by leading and participating in more than 1,200 service projects focused on local needs, including urban revitalization, literacy and education, housing, environmental conservation, health and human services, and disaster relief. In Canada, Citi volunteers will be participating in activities ranging from park cleanups to tree planting and working at food banks.

While Citi volunteers have a strong tradition of engaging in community service year-round, Global Community Day is an annual opportunity for Citi colleagues and other participants to join together and use their time, skills and expertise to make a difference in their cities. Since its launch in 2006, volunteers have participated in Citi Global Community Day activities, creating lasting impacts on cities around the world and reinforcing the idea that active corporate engagement is an essential component of a livable city.

"Volunteer service is one of the many ways Citi shows its commitment to the communities where we have a presence," said Citi CEO Michael Corbat. "Global Community Day highlights the great work of our community and non-profit partners, and we are excited to join them once again to strengthen our neighborhoods."
